Cut through the black line

It's a summer day in Zoolandia, and many animals have gone to the beach to enjoy the refreshing sea water.

He pulls Conny out of the water before he drowns!

Luckily, the lifeguard, Mr. Bull, is there.

Conny is thrilled: he's been waiting for an hour since he had his meal to go for a swim. When the alarm on his mother's phone rings, he runs into the water!

He does a cannonball, and the water is very cold.

But something goes wrong: Conny starts feeling dizzy, vomits... and faints!

The one who doesn't follow the advice is Crat, who, after a big meal, does a cannonball into the water... causing a massive wave that leaves everyone soaked!

A while later, Conny gradually enters the water.

Following Croco Doc's advice, he can swim without any problem.

Croco Doc and Crat arrive promptly in the ambulance. Everything seems to indicate that Conny is okay, although he experienced a hydrocution, that is, a cold water shock.

A cold water shock happens when the body suffers a sudden and extreme change in temperature.

There are many false myths about hydrocution. For example, there's no need to wait a long time after eating before going for a swim!

Conny had been sunbathing for a while and was overheated. When he jumped into the icy water, the abrupt change in temperatures caused dizziness, vomiting, and fainting.
